Re-globalizing trade for people and planet

While global trade has been a driver of global growth in recent decades and has raised living standards, the benefits of trade liberalization have not been distributed equally. In particular, developing and least-developed countries (LDCs) countries feel that the WTO and trade has not sufficiently delivered for them.

In an era of fragmentation, there is an opportunity to "re-globalize" supply chains, bringing in new countries and actors and creating more just societies. This panel discussion will consider how governments can develop more inclusive trade agendas and proactively implement policies that benefit workers, consumers and the environment.
